The Cato maior belongs to the end of Cicero's life. From the year 46 to his death in 42 B.C. he wrote incessantly on philosophical and rhetorical subjects. In literary work he sought to find consolation at once for his grief at the downfall of the old constitution, and for the deep pain he felt upon the loss of his beloved and only.

This paper proposes that the inscription at the base of the statue of Cato the Elder in the Temple of Salus, of which we hear via Plutarch, is mediated via famous lines from Ennius' Annales. Chapter 19 of Plutarch's Cato Maior describes conflicting elite and popular responses to Cato's censorship: as Plutarch has it, while the.

I have put the whole discourse not, as Alisto of Cos did, in the mouth of Tithonus—for a mere fable would have lacked conviction—but in that of Marcus Cato when he was an old man, to give my essay greater weight. I represent Lælius and Scipio at his house expressing surprise at his carrying his years so lightly, and Cato.

6. Greek Sources of the Cato Maior. Cicero, in the letter of dedication of the Cato Maior, refers to Aristo Cius as the author of a treatise on old age, and he may have drawn upon that author in writing his own treatise. In Chapters 2 and 3 the conversation between Cephalus and Socrates in Plato's Republic is closely followed.

Cato the Elder born Marcus Porcius Cato and also known as Cato the Censor (Cato Censorius), Cato the Wise (Cato Sapiens), and Cato the Ancient (Cato Priscus), was a Roman senator and historian known for his conservatism and opposition to Hellenization. The dialogue Cato Maior (De senectute) is often considered the Ciceronian text in which the topos of the "theater of life" (theatru mundi) is explicitly revealed most frequently (five of the eight times in which it appears in all of the works of this author). Little attention, however, has been given to the effects of this topos on the.
